THE MESSAGE.

It is stated that the President has inaugurated a new practice in the preparation of his messages—that he does not confine himself to the advice of his Cabinet on matters relating to the several departments, but has taken counsel of scholars, statesmen and financial experts upon certain matters to which he will refer in his message. There is no reason why the Chief Magistrate should not inform himself by application to the best sources of information, as well as any other citizen who seeks light. We are by no means sure that it is a new practice. There is reason to believe that other Presidents have done likewise. It is believed that Mr. Lincoln frequently had consultations with others than his Cabinet relative to communications to be sent to Congress. Mr. Cleveland will not be the first President either who has wholly written his own message, relegating no part of it to department heads. President Jackson, it is known, wrote messages in their entirety, concerning which no one outside the Cabinet knew the contents, even in part, until the document was sent to Congress. No President, however, has failed to embody in his message more or less of the recommendations of the Cabinet officers, and there is no known instance of Cabinet officers' reports having been ignored wholly, nor will those of President Cleveland be. It is altogether probable that if he has, after consulting with his official family, taken counsel also with others, as for instance, as is stated, with the venerable historian Bancroft, ex-official Government financiers, and distinguished men of his own party, whose proposed policies have been debated before the country. The only indication as to the contents of the forthcoming message that is given which is worthy of being accepted as authoritative, is that wherein it is stated that Mr. Cleveland will firmly adhere to the position taken by him upon the silver question in a letter written to the silver men prior to his inauguration.

NO DANGER.

The matter of the President resolving not to attend the funeral of Vice-President Hendricks to-day, because of the im-portunities of those who think the risk of travel on the part of the President at this juncture should not be incurred, makes it timely to say that there is unnecessary alarm about the safety of this Government. The Republic does not depend upon one or a dozen official lives. If both the President and the Vice-President should die at the same time, and the Speaker of the House and the Secretary of State still, this Government would though shocked, suffer no great harm. It is not of such fragile character that it would go to ruin in such a stress. Matters would go on much as before, and, saying the sense of grief the people would feel, there would be no manifestations injurious to the Republic. We have no fear of usurpers of authority in this Government of the people by the people. There are no pretenders to power here, and can be none. There are no ruling classes to contest for ascendancy. There is no notability to dictate to this people what forms of government shall prevail. The Constitution and the laws, and the Courts, can not die, or their functions be suspended, say in case of revolution. The nation has stood the test of greater shocks, and the Republic has been tried in fires such as are not likely to again assail it. True the events assumed would avail it little, but it would not involve the country in war, nor in anything more serious than a short and sudden campaign.

It is not surprising that the English pulpit took part in the late campaign.
The Church was assailed, and very naturally it returned the blow. The property of its doing so is not involved, because it was a question in which the Church was altogether interested. Had the pulpit remained silent under assault, men would have esteemed the clergy of England altogether a cowardly lot. Church disestablishment must and will come about some day, but no one is warranted in charging the clergy with undue interference in politics when they take part in the contests, that is liable to deprive them of their office.

AN ATTACHED DEPOSIT.

Some workmen who were paid were received for the laying of stone walks in the City Plaza. John McGillivray, one of the builders, put up a deposit of $60—three twenty-dollar gold pieces—which he had borrowed for that special purpose from Mr. Pyle. The deposit was held by the contractor, who refused to give it up, on the fact that it had been attached to his hands by W. J. O'Brien, one of Mr. McGillivray's creditors. The City Attorney was appealed to, and the Auditor—the Auditor "to hold on to the coin for a few days." Both parties employed attorneys to get the deposit back, and the sixty dollars were given back to the contractor for the same sum.
